

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- <sup>1</sup> The Book That Makes Itself
Robin Cameron
self published, 2010
- <sup>2</sup> A Not B
Uta Eisenerich
Roma Publications, 2010
- <sup>3</sup> Brix
Hans-Peter Feldmann
Contemporary Art Gallery, Vancouver 2006
- <sup>4</sup> Ringer Annual Report 2007
David Ringer, David Weiss
RFP Ringers, 2007
- <sup>5</sup> Mexico 68 / CU
Hedden Hofland
Kodex Press, 2006
- <sup>6</sup> Scholar Kelly
John Kelley
La Mania Publications, 2010
- <sup>7</sup> *We Would Come to Doubt Everything
And Almost Everyone Would Come to Doubt*
Wynne van Kruken
self published, 2008
- <sup>8</sup> Carrara
Agata Konrad
Roma Publications, 2011

BIBLIOGRAPHY (CONT)

- <sup>9</sup> Ashes and Broken Brickwork of a Logical Theory
Susanne Kriemann
Roma Publications, 2009
- <sup>10</sup> One Time One Million
Susanne Kriemann
Roma Publications, 2009
- <sup>11</sup> *Hifter Moves East:
A Graphic Chronicle 1941-43*
David Levithal and Garry Trudeau
Sheed Andrews & McMeel, 1977
- <sup>12</sup> Book Wall
Sel Levitt
Tanglewood Press, 1977
- <sup>13</sup> PhotoGrids
Sel Levitt
Paul David Press / Rizzoli, 1977
- <sup>14</sup> The Destruction of Lower Manhattan
Danny Lyon, 1969
- <sup>15</sup> A Study On Colour
Katja Mater
Heden, 2007
- <sup>16</sup> Sight Seeing
Futoshi Miyagi
self published, 2011

BIBLIOGRAPHY (CONT)

- <sup>17</sup> Yarnish and Mortar
Yvonne Rainer
Little More, 2011
- <sup>18</sup> 3World
The Economy in Two Inadequate Descriptive Systems
Martha Rosler
The Press of the Nova Scotia
College of Art and Design, 1981
- <sup>19</sup> Let Master: A Visual Strategy
Salome Schmid, Iman Hayashi, Corina Kistell
Koski Press, 2009
- <sup>20</sup> Bangkok
Hedi Specker and Germaine Krull
Ann und Jürgen Wilde, 2005
- <sup>21</sup> Poet (Vanden Inget)
Andrea Stohler
Post Editions, 2010
- <sup>22</sup> A Stack of Books
Trin Tattou
Rollo Press, 2011
- <sup>23</sup> Der Raum
Erik van der Weide
447621N, 2010

Pradeep Dala & Pierre Le Hors
The Book Is No Image

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE
OCT. 18 - DEC. 11, 2011
ICP LIBRARY

Liner notes on a selection of 23 photography books with an engaging yet low-key conceptual structure, sequence or idea, somewhat subversive, occasionally funny, with a few serious, austere and tough books thrown in the mix, mostly modest in scale, with one exception.

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

As a record of the artist's thought process during a year of graduate study, this is a dense, difficult, at times maddeningly introspective book. I am drawn to it because its self-consciousness reflects my own experience in school, it rings true in its insistence on the value of a self-questioning process.<sup>1</sup>

Eisenreich's meticulous stagings exist in a realm that lies somewhere between commercial and artistic photographic enterprises and are reminiscent of the 'No. B' project with philosophical resonance. A No. B locates pleasure in the incongruity of reason, in deconstructive ordering and logical fallacies. Grossly designed by Julia Born.<sup>2</sup>

Birgit is a straightforward sequence of photographs that depicts a woman putting on stakes. We are witness to a subtle transformation, occurring over a short stretch of time, put in perspective by the artist's text and meditative musings on the medium of photography, or perhaps an elegy to film. I think about paper, lighting as development, darkening into an image. What is being exposed, and what develops?

Each year the Swiss publishing company Wieser commissions an artist to realize a project for their annual report. This year, Fischer chose to collect hundreds of tiny page advertisements from the pages of current magazines, sequencing them to highlight their formal relationships. The result is a stirring overview of the western world's desires, hopes, fears and aspirations through the lens of consumerism. The book's weight and dimensions have as much to say as the content itself.<sup>3</sup>

I am particularly fond of the book La Mama of the Ciudad Universitaria in Mexico City, especially the

INTERNATIONAL CENTER OF PHOTOGRAPHY
1114 AVENUE OF THE AMERICAS AT 43RD ST.
NEW YORK, NY 10036

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

library building by Juan O'Gorman, and liked Holzhausen's Mexico 48 / Cuernavaca for its architectural photographs. Only recently after watching a film on the 1968 protests in Mexico did I return to her second volume comprised of interviews with activists of the student movement and began to appreciate the seriousness of her project: the photographs of the stone buildings and the in-depth interviews in two self-designed volumes, plus a special web site, were a powerful testament to the spirit of the exhibition.<sup>4</sup>

I saw this exhibition at La Mama in Mexico City, at 4th street, and really liked the beautifully composed aerial photographs of the artist lying down on an orange blanket with strown oranges, rolling on characters from Tegn Schat's paintings. The sequence of images ebbed and flowed nicely. I also liked the text panels in Vienna separate manner, and the way in which the paintings, performances, photographs, text panels, and the text paintings all combine in a loose but effective ensemble.

We Would Come to Doubt Everything around Juan, for whom consequential events in his youth became the cause to search for a certain truth. He had to leave Mexico and we can't wait to see again. Several years ago he had the desire to leave his life as a hermit in a small village in the south of the Netherlands behind, to start all over in Comillas, Spain. A place, in his opinion, will be of crucial importance for world history.
(Wytke van Krevel)

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

Van Krevel takes us through a lengthy, winding narrative that slowly unfolds over geography and history, painting a nuanced picture of a man with a singular vision. Dense with information and rich in incidental details, in a well-known style, the book is both a guide and an enthralling. Here she combines casual snapshots with more precise serials to reveal a site that is beautiful yet disturbingly depicted. The steady accumulations of images suck you in, confronts and induces.<sup>5</sup>

Here is another assemblage project from Kriemann, about a desert, a family of mice. She places photographs from Agathe Christie's archive together with her own photographs of the desert in Syria and sites in Mesopotamia. She includes pages from key archaeology texts and the magnificently scaled cover, which promises to be poetry in motion and also frontal views of apartment buildings. This project feels cohesive and richly suggestive, yet I wonder if it can address the really thorny questions of how so many of these objects are sitting in museum collections in Europe and America and so much of the documentation and subject matter is missing.<sup>6</sup>

In an auction at the Army Museum in Stockholm, Kriemann bought a 1940 Victor Hasselblad reconnaissance camera with some rolls of old film. Then she hired

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

a helicopter and took aerial photographs of modernist housing outside of Stockholm using this old camera. She also found other photographs taken by this camera in arid areas of Sweden and tracked down photographs of birds taken by Victor Hasselblad. She made some amazing photographs of this 1940 camera, and the distinctive look of the Hasselblad models that we are familiar with is already in the DNA of this early prototype. I loved the way these different yet related stories and images were woven together in such a tight, rhythmic fashion.<sup>7</sup>

Adopting the vocabulary of war reportage, Levitt recreates a photographic account of Germany's ill-fated drive into Soviet territory. What's remarkable is how faithful to the form his pseudo-report manages to be — especially given the limits of his disposal. This attends to the visuality of the period through its graphic idioms, but also to the textual and graphic organization of the books this work pays tribute to. Its inclusion felt appropriate given the library extensive Capa holdings.<sup>8</sup>

A plain white square, soft cover book with the title in small black letters and a representation of a map. The photograph on the cover is a brick wall — pretty dull, right? Not an easy book to look at, yet even something as unremarkable as a brick wall, that every single one of us has seen and locked into our memory bank, in LeWitt's hands reveals something new: a large range of textures from light gray to almost black, and a graphic design like that.

The white square cover reminds me of the Beatles White Album designed by the artist Richard Hamilton, and I particularly like its reticence and simplicity. Nine

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

I found this book a few years ago in a favorite bookstore in Manhattan, New York, and was drawn to the superb architectural photographs. At that time I justified the rather expensive purchase by thinking that it gave me access to a Marabar that I never got to see — I moved here only eight years ago. All the better, I thought, those would help me understand the great cast iron buildings of Soho in a less sleek and non-commercial light. Only later did I understand how powerful and particular this book is — the text is fast, the photographs are tough and spellbinding, from the unromantic view of Marabar to the Brooklyn Bridge to portraits of the workers demolishing the buildings. Absolutely nothing formulaic, nothing sentimental, nothing elegiac. If only I could see with such uncompromising clarity.<sup>9</sup>

Mater's documentary captures photos of her friends' spouses who conceal a systematic investigation into the literotaurines of Sete. The resulting sine is presented as the findings of a survey, the outcome of her research. In a great move, the wheel themselves are reproduced in black and white halftones.<sup>10</sup>

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

Photograph a person, in darkness, with exposure of one minute or more. I've never faced a subject in a honest manner using photographic medium. I staged myself, I went viral. I never thought that I would be invited to call myself a photographer in the end, what I wanted from shooting sessions were not photographs themselves, but relationships formed there. Even if the situation was staged, even if the whole thing looked like a dream, I looked for a possibility. I liked the slowness of the process.
(Futoshi Miyagi)

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

more often, if there is a connection, it is the simultaneous darkening of mood as the two systems run along concurrently.<sup>11</sup>
(Martha Rosler)

The subject of this book is the odd visual relationship between two disparate systems of pictorial order: government propaganda, advertising jets, missiles and bombs to popular leisure, and the formal group portraits of sportsmen and the military. While the images themselves emphasize straight-forward, symmetrical arrangements, the book's designers have chosen a rhythmic layout that consistently folds on and reads. About ten years ago I had a book based on the photographs of Gerda Krull — a European avant-garde photographer who had also made photographs in India and Thailand in the 1940s and 50s. And much later I saw Krull's images in a book by a young American named a youngish photographer who makes architectural and abstract photographs. I marveled at the guts with which she made this collaborative work, twenty years after Krull died. The two women, Krull and Speckert, photographed the same Buddhist and Buddhist temples in Bangkok — and Speckert's super contemporary pictures of architectural details and patterns of Bangkok don't quite mesh, but I do like how this odd book gestures towards a wider space.<sup>12</sup>

Hence the explanation of the project produced by the author: "Most Ugandans are unable to take a holiday. But it is possible for them to have photos taken with a better world in the background once a year. This shows the photo studio of East African Uganda as places where one can escape from reality for a short while. In this book, the reader can reconstruct the small studios spiced by imagination, the cameras, the prints, the viewer is from a found negative, and she also includes photographs of passport photographs drying in the studio. Her approach to documentary is admirably open, and she is always willing to author and make every image pay rich dividends.<sup>13</sup>

A Stack of Books is a love letter to the printed page under the guise of a formal exercise: bookmaking as book art. The author takes sets of books and renders them to form a new book of her own. The process uncovers odd connections between wide ranging, disparate source material.<sup>14</sup>

The trees in these pictures appear as centroids, as worlds presented as a point too distant to be in our grasp. The discovery that one or two images conceal a traumatic history casts suspicion on them all. The neatly trimmed hedges and lined up city apartment blocks are the symbols of the past, all of which carry the same suffocating impulse. Every detail is loaded, each scene becomes the location for some potential crime.
Dear Room depicts a world that is permeated by doubt.<sup>15</sup>

BIBLIOGRAPHY

<sup>1</sup> The Book That Makes Itself
Robin Cameron
self-published, 2010

<sup>2</sup> A Not B
Uta Eisenreich
Roma Publications, 2010

<sup>3</sup> Birgit
Hans-Peter Feldmann
Contemporary Art Gallery, Vancouver 2006

<sup>4</sup> Ringier Annual Report 2007
Peter Fischli and David Weiss
JRP Ringier, 2007

<sup>5</sup> Mexico 68 / CU
Heidrun Holzfeind
Kodoji Press, 2006

<sup>6</sup> Schiele-Kelly
John Kelley
La Mama Publications, 2010

<sup>7</sup> We Would Come to Doubt Everything,
And Almost Everyone Would Come to Doubt,
Wytske van Keulen
self-published, 2008

<sup>8</sup> Carrara
Agnata Konrad
Roma Publications, 2011

BIBLIOGRAPHY (CONT.)

<sup>9</sup> Ashes and Broken Brickwork
of a Logical Theory
Susanne Kriemann
Roma Publications, 2009

<sup>10</sup> One Time One Million
Susanne Kriemann
Roma Publications, 2009

<sup>11</sup> Hitler Moves East:
A Graphic Chronicle, 1941-43
David Levinthal and Garry Trudeau
Sheed Andrews & McMeel, 1977

<sup>12</sup> Brick Wall
Sol LeWitt
Tanglewood Press, 1977

<sup>13</sup> PhotoGrids
Sol LeWitt
Paul David Press / Rizzoli, 1977

<sup>14</sup> The Destruction of Lower Manhattan
Danny Lyon
Macmillan, 1969

<sup>15</sup> A Study On Colour
Katja Mater
Heden, 2007

<sup>16</sup> Sight Seeing
Futoshi Miyagi
self-published, 2011

BIBLIOGRAPHY (CONT.)

<sup>17</sup> Varnish and Mortar
Yusuke Nagai
Little More, 2011

<sup>18</sup> 3 Works
(The Bowery in Two Inadequate Descriptive Systems)
Martha Rosler
The Press of the Nova Scotia
College of Art and Design, 1981

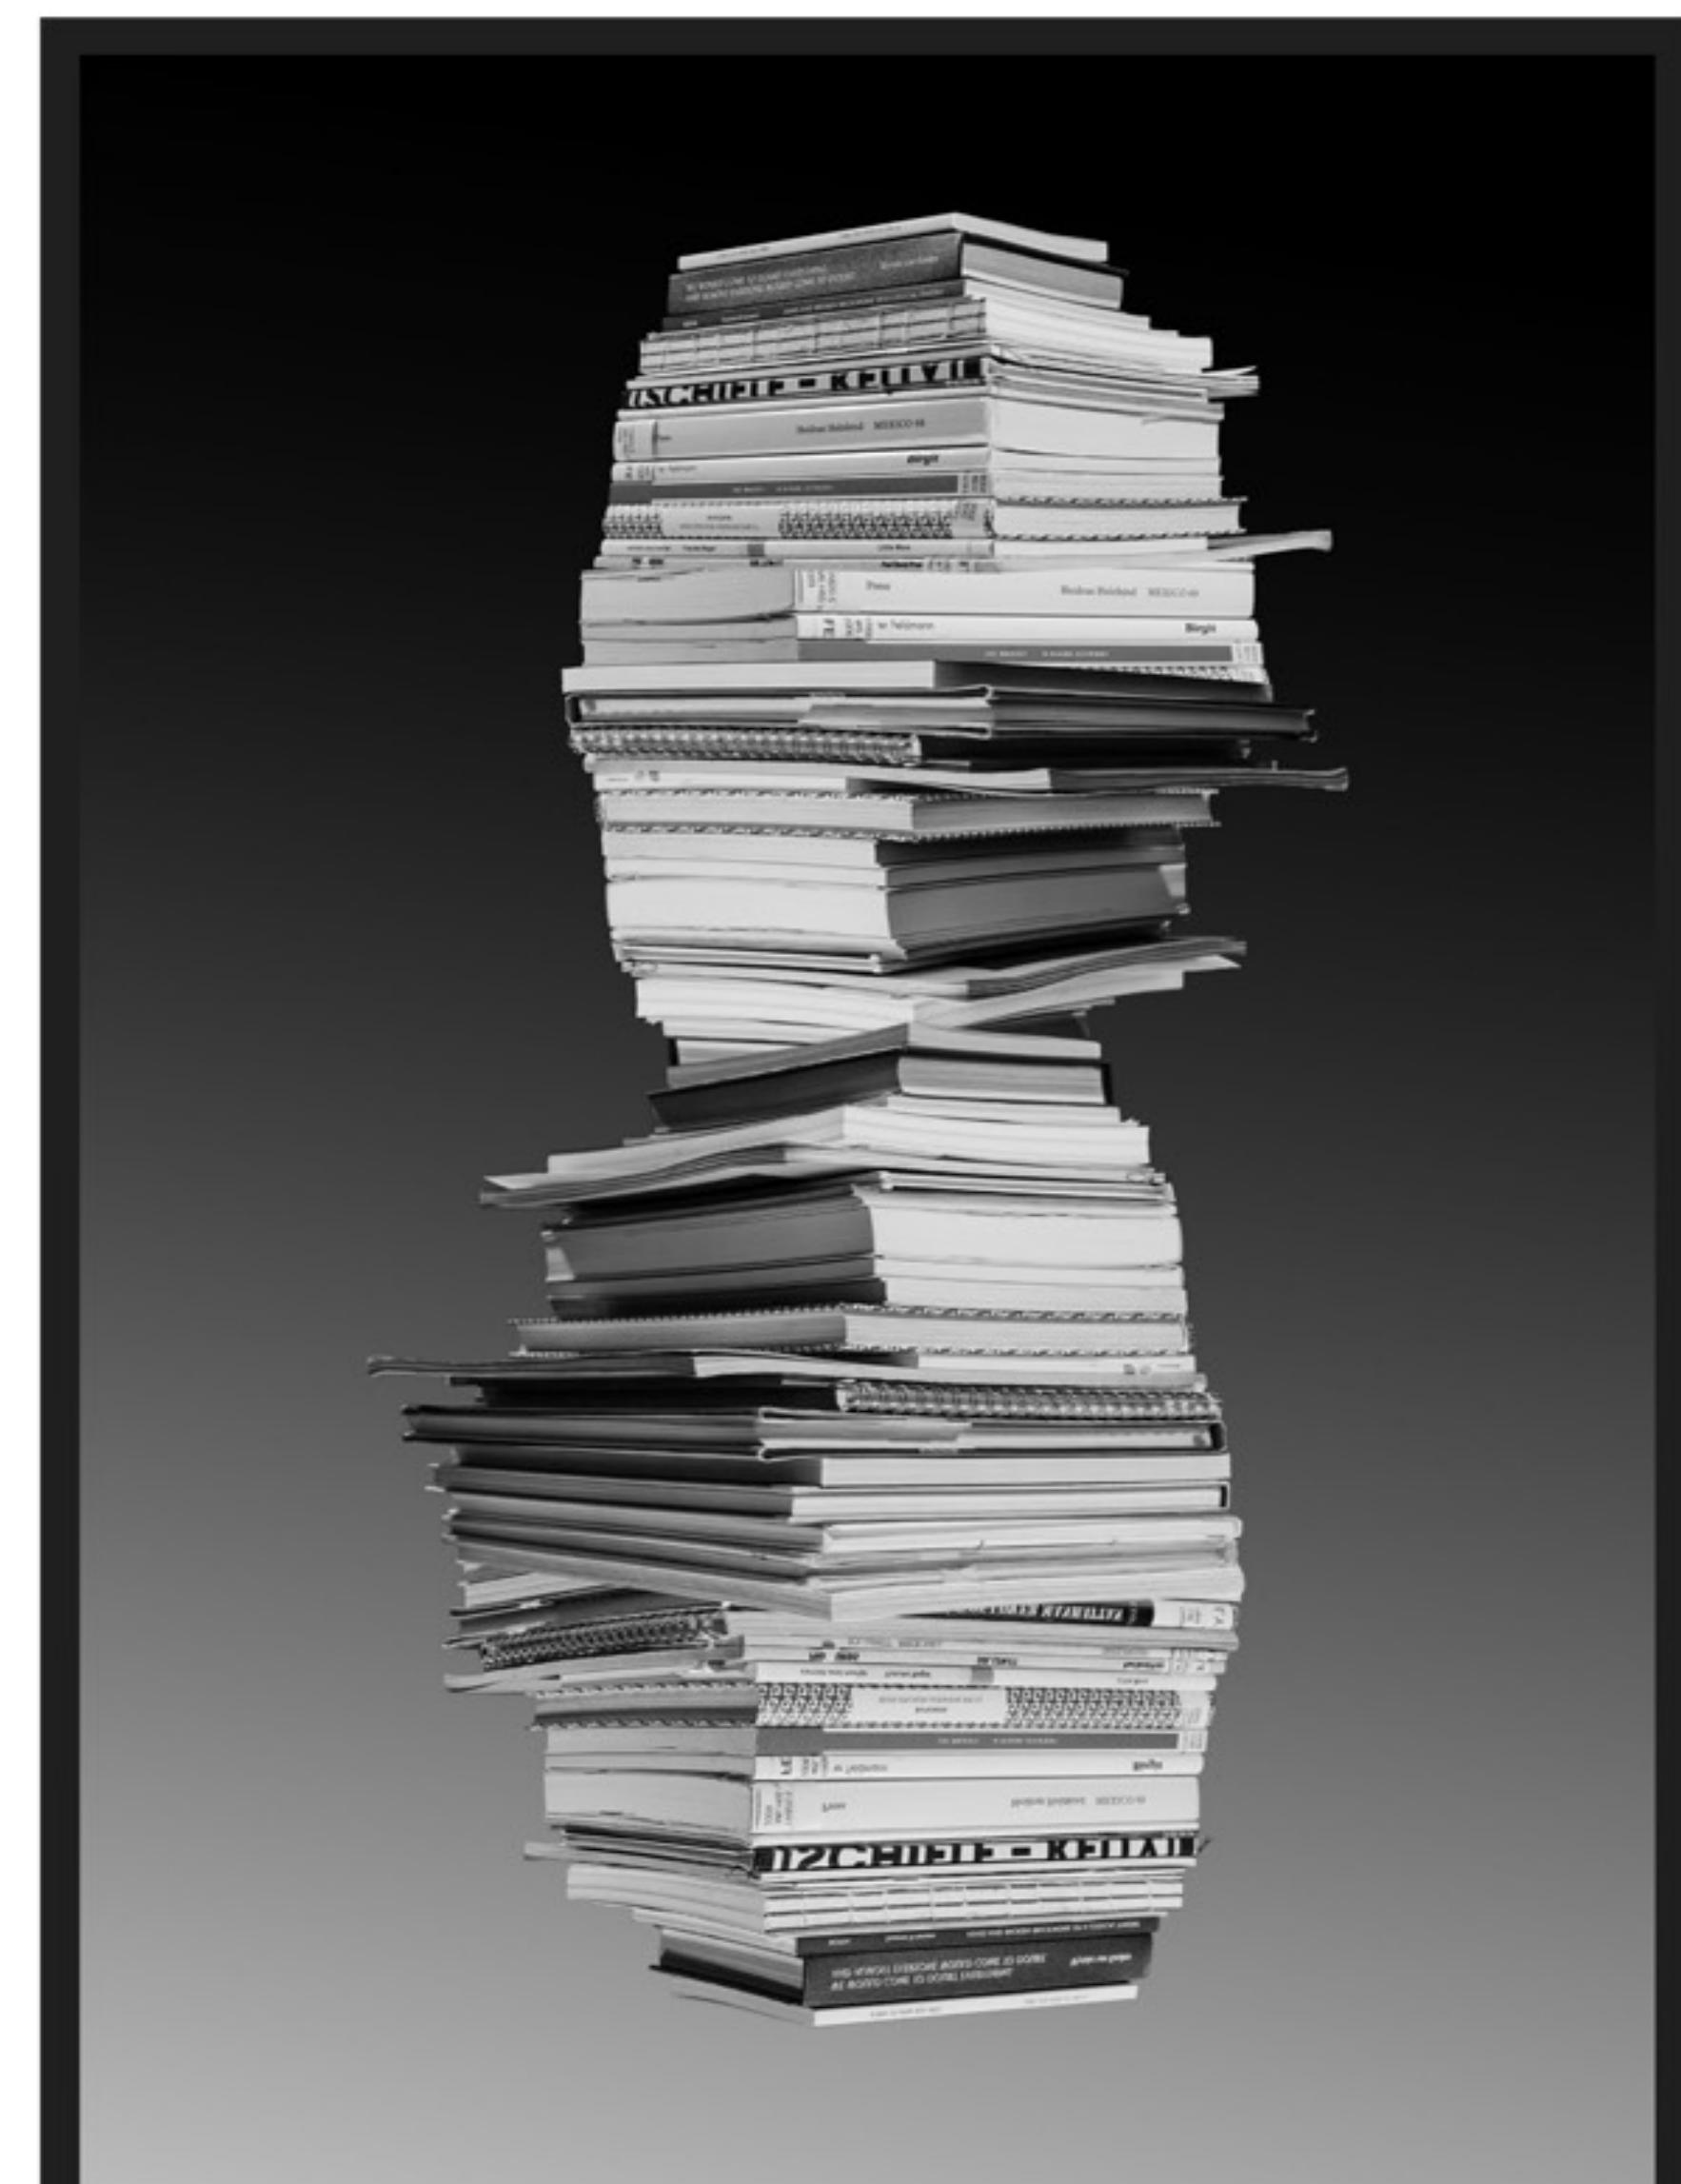

<sup>19</sup> Jet Master: A Visual Strategy
Salome Schimuki, Idan Hayosh, Corina Künzli
Kodoji Press, 2009

<sup>20</sup> Bangkok
Heidi Specker and Germaine Krull
Ann und Jürgen Wilde, 2005

<sup>21</sup> Pose (Ugandan Images)
Andrea Stultens
Post Editions, 2010

<sup>22</sup> A Stack of Books
Triin Tamm
Rollo Press, 2011

<sup>23</sup> Der Baum
Erik van der Weijde
4478ZINE, 2010

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE
OCT. 28 - DEC. 15, 2011
ICP LIBRARY

Liner notes on a selection of 23 photography books with an engaging yet low-key conceptual structure, sequence or idea, somewhat subversive, occasionally funny, with a few serious, austere and tough books thrown in the mix, mostly modest in scale, with one exception.

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

As a record of the artist's thought process during a year of graduate study, this is a dense, difficult, at times maddeningly introspective book. I am drawn to it because its self-consciousness reflects my own experience in school, it rings true in its insistence on the value of a self-questioning process.

Eisenreich's meticulous stagings exist in a realm that lies somewhere between commercial product photography, instructional manuals and visual IQ tests. Paired with philosophical problems, A Not B locates pleasure in the incongruities of reason, in idiosyncratic orderings and logical fallacies. Gorgeously designed by Julia Born,<sup>3</sup> Birgit is a straightforward sequence of photographs that depicts a woman putting on makeup. We are witness to a subtle transmutation, occurring over a short stretch of time, page by page. I've always read it as Feldmann's meditation on the medium of photography, or perhaps an elegy to film. I think about paper, floating in developer, darkening into an image. What is being exposed, and what develops?

Each year the Swiss publishing conglomerate Ringier commission an artist to realize a project for their annual report. Here Fischli and Weiss have reproduced hundreds of full-page advertisements from the pages of current magazines, sequencing them to highlight their formal relationships. The result is a dizzying overview of the western world's desires, hopes, fears and aspirations through the lens of consumerism. The book's weight and dimensions have as much to say as the content itself.<sup>4</sup>

I was familiar with the modernist architecture of the Ciudad Universitaria in Mexico City, especially the library building by Juan O'Gorman, and liked Holzfeind's straightforward, documentary-like photographs. Only recently after watching a film on the 1968 protests in Mexico did I return to her second volume comprised of interviews with activists of the student movement and began to appreciate the seriousness of her project: the photographs of the mute buildings and the in-depth interviews in two well-designed volumes, plus a special web site and videos and installation shots of the exhibition.<sup>5</sup>

3

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

I saw this exhibition at La Mama gallery on East 4th street and really liked the beautifully sequenced aerial photographs of the artist lying down on an orange blanket with strewn oranges, riffing on characters from Egon Schiele's paintings. The sequence of images ebbed and flowed nicely. I also liked the text panels in a Vienna secession manner, and the way in which the paintings, performances, photographs, video-stills, and the text paintings all combine in a loose but effective ensemble.<sup>6</sup>

We Would Come to Doubt Everything evolved around Juan, for whom consequential events in his youth have become the cause to search for a certain truth, a bigger truth than we can or want to imagine. Several years ago Juan made the choice to leave his life as a dentist in a small village in the south of the Netherlands behind, to start all over in Garabandal, Spain. A place that, in his opinion, will be of crucial importance for world history.

(Wytse van Keulen)

4

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

Van Keulen takes us through a lengthy, winding narrative that slowly unfolds over geography and history, painting a nuanced picture of a man with a singular vision. Dense with information and rich in incidental details, oddly affecting and deeply mysterious — this is cinema to me.<sup>7</sup>

I sort-of liked her earlier book Desert Cities and Elasticity but was unable to make sense of them — the photographs varied from dramatic aerials to fuzzy, xeroxed city views. However, this book on the most well-known marble quarry in the world is focused and unrelenting. Here she combines casual snapshots with more precise aerials to reveal a site that is beautiful yet disturbingly depleted. The steady accumulation of images sucks you in, confronts and indicts.<sup>8</sup>

Here is another associational project from Kriemann, about archaeology — a favorite theme of mine. She places photographs from Agathie Christie's archives together with her own photographs of the desert in Syria and sites in Mesopotamia. She includes pages from key archaeology texts, and the photographs, modestly scaled cover superb aerial views to small pottery shards and also frontal views of apartment buildings. This project feels cohesive and richly suggestive, yet I wonder if it can address the really thorny questions of how so many of these objects are sitting in museum collections in Europe and America and so much of the documentation and scholarship is also driven from the West.<sup>9</sup>

In an auction at the Army Museum in Stockholm, Kriemann bought a 1940 Victor Hasselblad reconnaissance camera with some rolls of old film. Then she hired

5

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

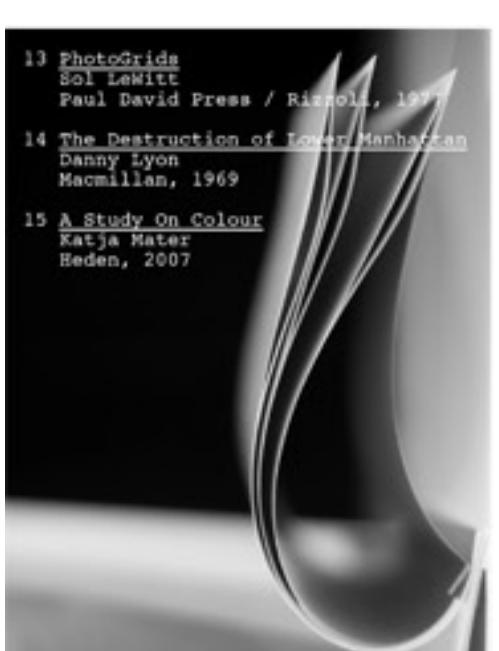

a helicopter and took aerial photographs of modernist housing outside of Stockholm using this old camera. She also found other photographs taken by this camera in archives in Sweden and also tracked down photographs of birds taken by Victor Hasselblad. She also made some amazing photographs of this 1940 camera, and the distinctive look of the Hasselblad models that we are familiar with is already in the DNA of this early prototype. I loved the way these different yet related stories are brought together, adjacent but not forced together.<sup>10</sup>

Adopting the vocabulary of war reportage, Levinthal recreates a photographic account of Germany's ill-fated drive into Soviet territory. What's remarkable is how faithful to the form his pseudo-record manages to be — especially given the means at his disposal. This attests to the close attention paid not only to photographic idioms, but also to the textual and graphic organization of the books this work pays tribute to. Its inclusion felt appropriate given the library's extensive Capa holdings.<sup>11</sup>

A plain white square, soft cover book with the title in small black letters that registers surprisingly sharply. The photographs here are of brick walls — pretty dull, right? Not an easy book to look at, yet even something as unremarkable as a brick wall, that every single one of us has seen and locked into our memory bank, in LeWitt's hands reveals something new: a large range of textures, tones from light gray to almost black, and a graphic drawing-like feel.<sup>12</sup> square images per page, 18 such images in a spread. The images are pretty casual, the geometry of the forms within the images can be skewed or foreshortened, but this does not bother me. I do not really know how to make sense of all these images in grids — no hierarchy, no beginning, no middle, no end, and no essay to anchor or puff up the work. Very spare, no padding at all — and the pages with the turquoise Islamic arches with rich patterning and calligraphy are terrific!<sup>13</sup>

The white square cover reminds me of the Beatles White Album designed by the artist Richard Hamilton, and I particularly like its reticence and simplicity. Nine

6

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

I found this book a few years ago in a favorite bookstore on Mercer Street, and was drawn to the superb architectural photographs. At that time I justified the rather expensive purchase by thinking that it gave me access to a Manhattan that I never got to see — I moved here only eight years ago — and also that these photos would help me imagine the great cast-iron buildings of Soho in a less-sleek and non-commercial light. Only later did I understand how powerful and particular this book is — the text is taut, the photographs are tough and spellbinding, from the unsurpassed aerial view of Manhattan over the Brooklyn Bridge to portraits of the workers demolishing the buildings. Absolutely nothing formulaic, nothing sentimental, nothing elegiac. If only I could see with such unblinking clarity and understanding.<sup>14</sup>

Mater's deceptively casual, offhand shots of her friends spinning color wheels conceal a systematic investigation into the idiosyncrasies of seeing. The resulting zine is presented as the findings of a survey, the outcome of her research. In a great move, the wheels themselves are reproduced in black and white halftones.<sup>15</sup>

7

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

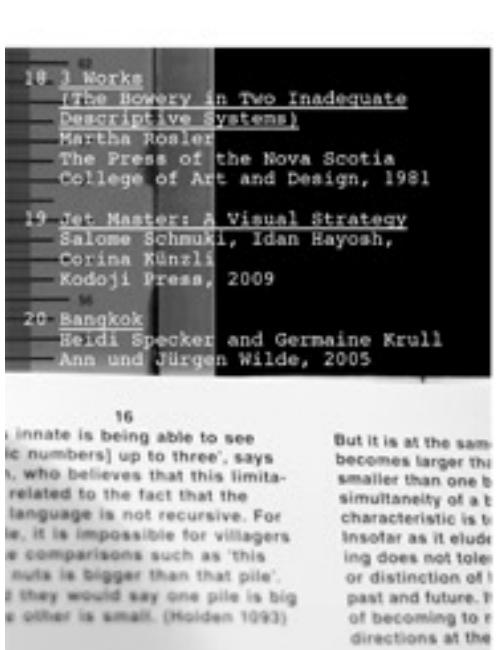

Photograph a person, in darkness, with exposure time of one minute or more. I've never faced a subject in a honest manner using photographic media. Sometimes I staged, sometimes I went virtual. I never thought that I would be qualified to call myself a photographer, in the end, what I wanted from shooting sessions were not photographs themselves, but relationships formed there. Even if the situation was staged, even if the whole thing seemed like a detour, I looked for a possibility. I liked the slowness of the process.

(Futoshi Miyagi)

I am struck by how much care has been given to the production of this book (paper stock, printing, binding), while the material itself is presented as sketches: tentative marks, tape-up prints and halting collages. The refined presentation foregrounds the uncertainty of each gesture without collapsing into preciousness.<sup>16</sup>

The words begin outside the world of skid row and slide into it, as people are thought to slide into alcoholism and slide to the bottom of the row. The text ends twice, comprising two series. First the adjectives, beginning with playful metaphor to describe the early, widely acceptable stages of intoxication and moving towards the boldness of stupor and death. A second series begins, of nouns belonging firmly to the Bowery and not shared with the world outside. Occasionally the texts address the photographs directly:

8

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

more often, if there is a connection, it is the simultaneous darkening of mood as the two systems run along concurrently.<sup>17</sup>

(Martha Rosler)

The subject of this book is the odd visual relationship between two disparate systems of pictorial order: government photographs advertising jets, missiles and bombs to potential buyers, and the formal group portraits used in sports, schools and the military. While the images themselves emphasize straight-forward, symmetrical arrangements, the book's designers have chosen a dyslexic layout that consistently tools an easy read.<sup>18</sup>

About ten years ago I had come across a book on the photographer Germaine Krull — a European avant-garde photographer who had also made photographs in India and Thailand in the 1940s and 50s. And much later I saw Krull's images in a little book made by Heidi Specker, a young German photographer who makes architectural and abstract photographs. I marveled at the guts with which she made this collaborative work, twenty years after Krull died. The two sets of images — Krull's photographs of statues of the Buddha and Buddhist temples in Bangkok — and Specker's super contemporary pictures of architectural details and patterns of Bangkok don't quite mesh, but I do like how this odd book gestures towards a wider span of time.<sup>19</sup>

Here is the explanation of the project provided by the author: "Most Ugandans are unable to take a holiday. But it is possible for them to have photos taken with a better world in the background once a year. Pose shows the photo studios of East-African Uganda as places where one can escape from reality for a short while. In this book, the reader can reconstruct the small studio space by folding out panoramic photos." The lovely cover image is from a found negative, and she also includes photographs of passport photographs drying in the studio. Her approach to documentary is admirably open, and this loosening up of the desire to author and make every image pays rich dividends.<sup>20</sup>

9

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE

A Stack of Books is a love letter to the printed page under the guise of a found exercise: bookmaking as book-sampling. Tamai takes sets of books and reorders them to form a new Book of Stacks, and in the process uncovers odd connections between wide-ranging, disparate source material.<sup>21</sup>

The trees in these pictures appear as sentinels, as guards preventing entry into a past too distant to know first-hand. The discovery that one or two images conceal a traumatic history casts suspicion on them all. The neatly trimmed hedges and lined up cars, apartment blocks and rows of municipal buildings, all seem part of the same suffocating impulse. Every detail is loaded, each scene becomes the location for some potential crime. Der Baum depicts a world that is permeated by doubt.<sup>22</sup>

10

INTERNATIONAL CENTER OF
PHOTOGRAPHY
LIBRARY

The BOOK IS NO IMAGE

Posted on November 17, 2011 by matthew carson

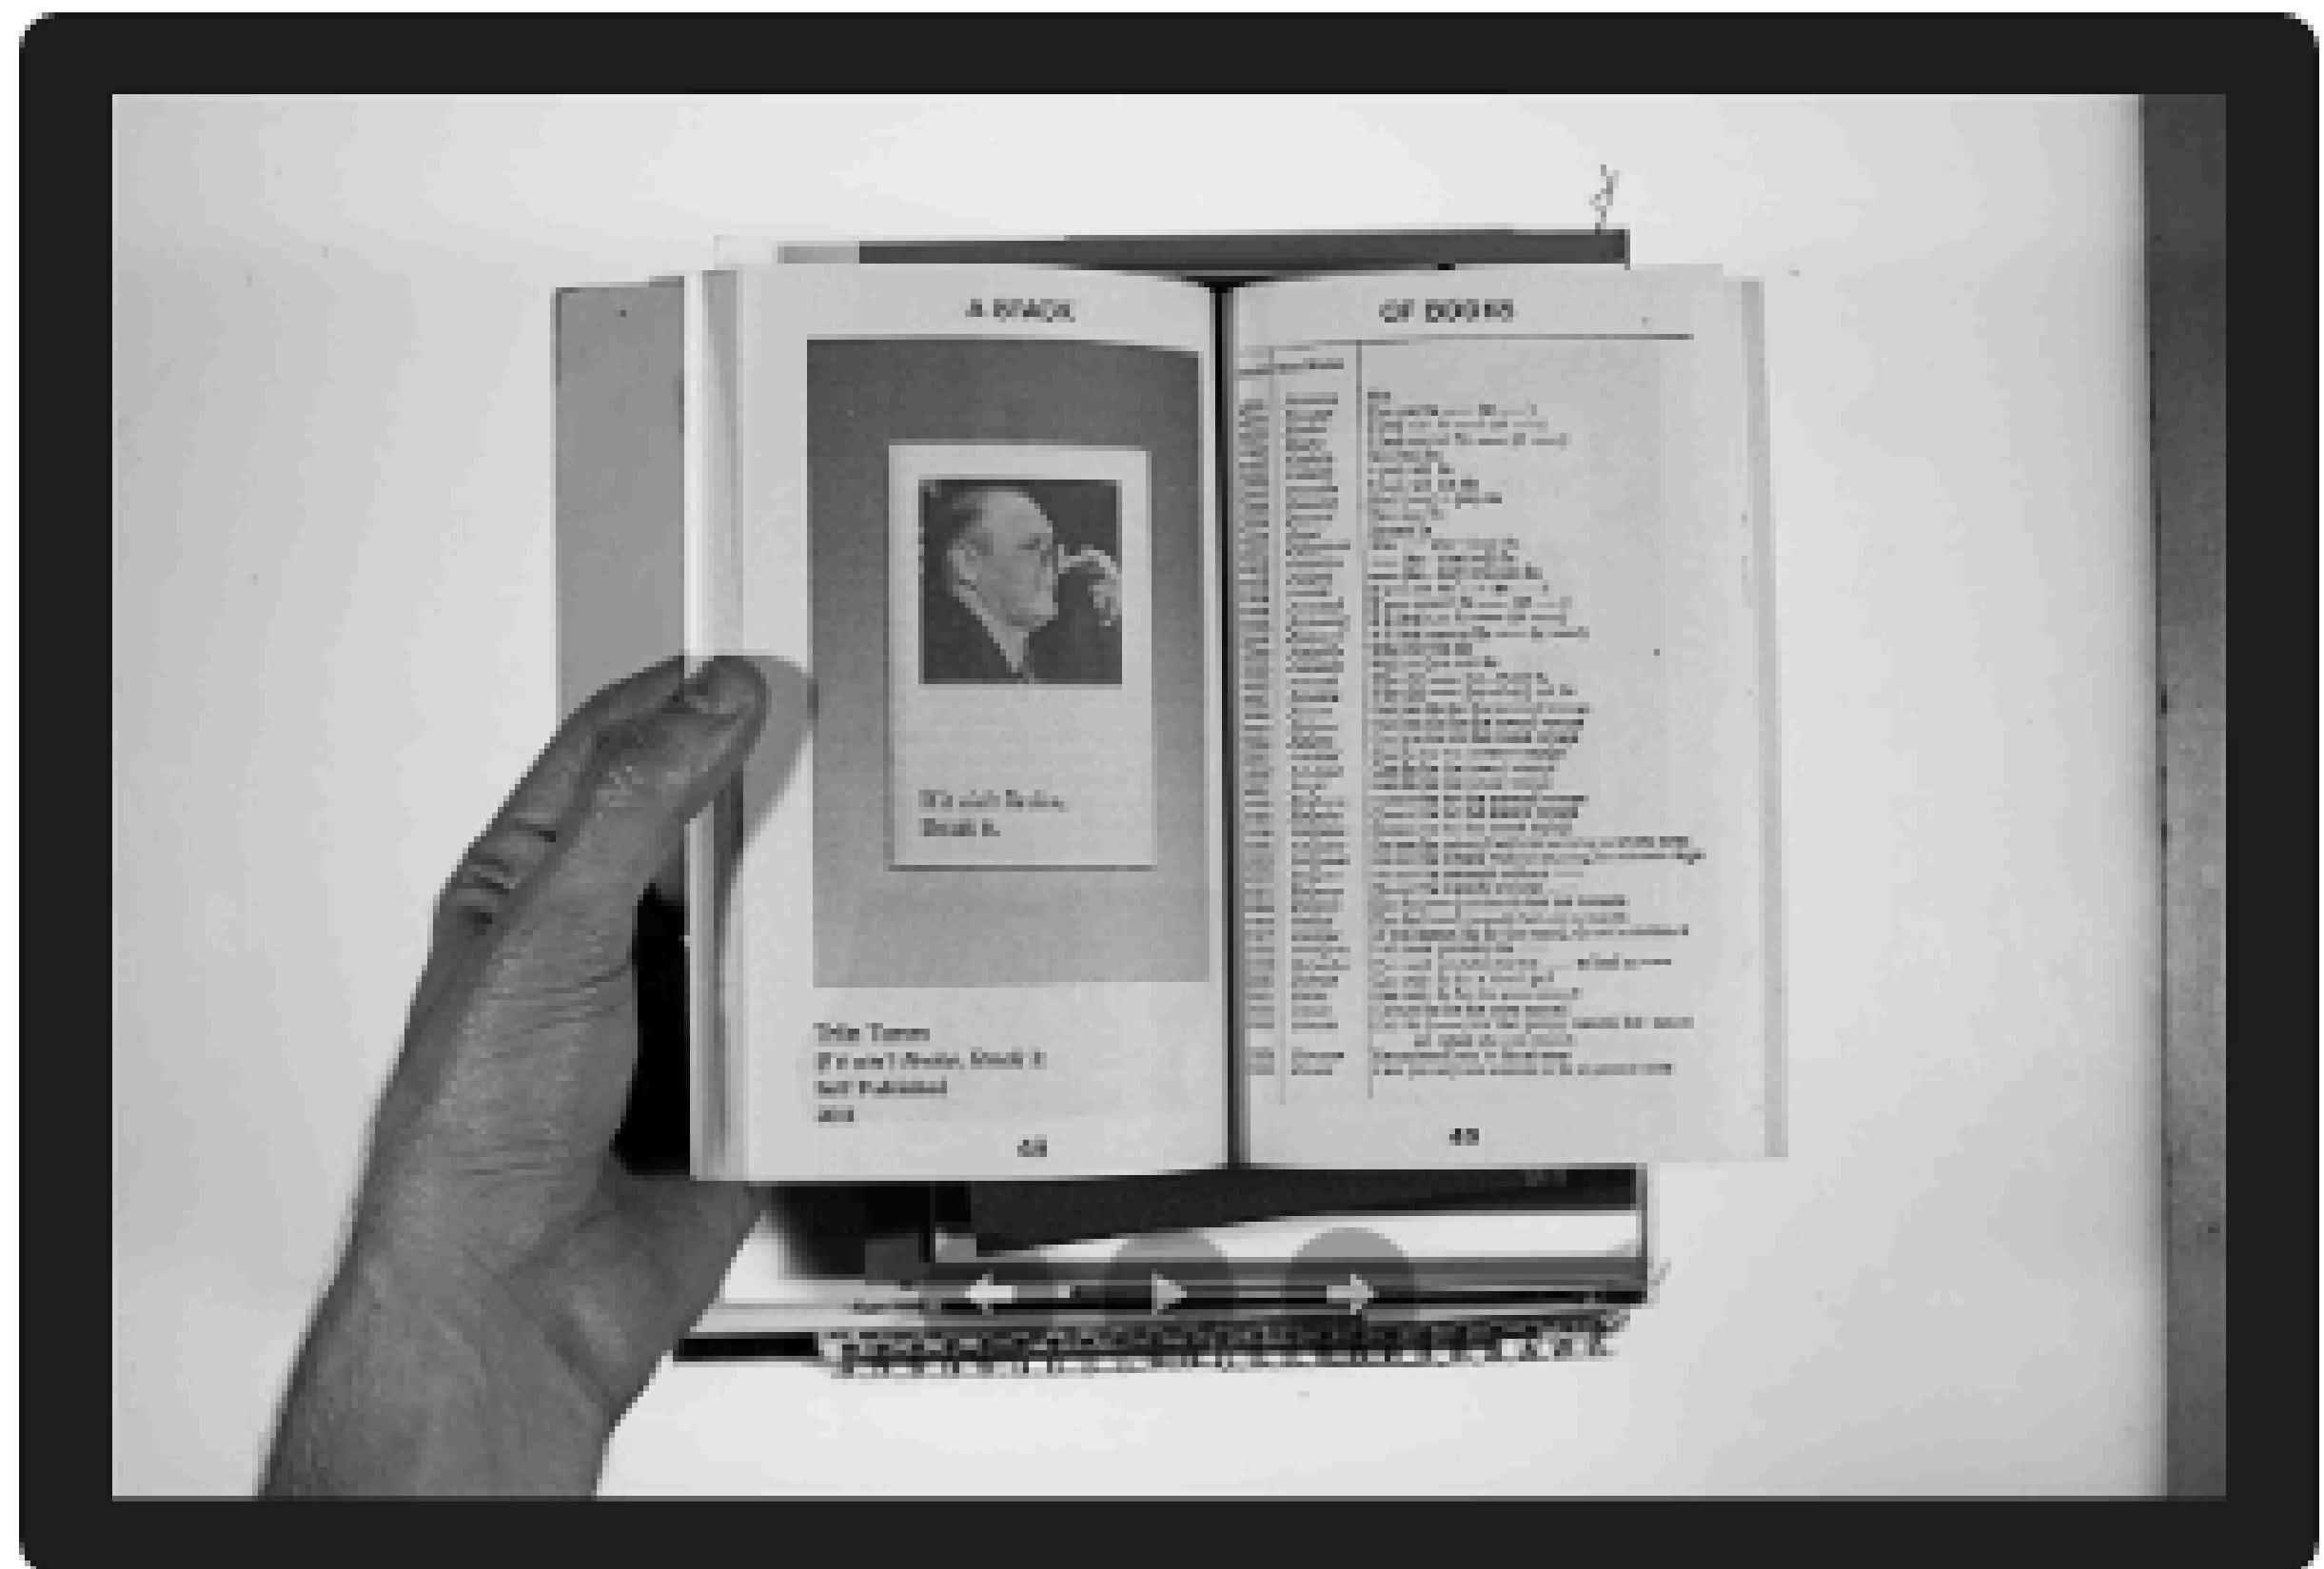

ICP LIBRARY EXHIBITION: October 28 – December 15, 2011

Talk & Reception: Friday December 2nd, 2011

THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE
Pradeep Dalal & Pierre Le Hors

The current exhibit in the ICP library window is "THE BOOK IS NO IMAGE" by Pradeep Dalal and Pierre Le Hors. It is selection of 23 photographic based artists' books with an engaging yet low-key conceptual structure, sequence or idea, which are somewhat subversive, occasionally funny, and with a few serious, austere and tough books thrown in the mix, mostly modest in scale, with one exception.

Pradeep and Pierre (P&P as I like to call them) are both amazing artists in their own right and they are both total biblio-maniacs. That means that they are seriously crazy about books. Photobooks. Artists' books. Crazy. Both the curators of this exhibit are graduates of the ICP/Bard MFA program. Pradeep is now faculty at the ICP and every week he checks out the most amazing books for his classes. Pierre, as an innovative creator of artists' books, has produced some truly wonderful items, including one of my favourite items of this year Blotter (TR179.5 .B56 2011). They are practitioners and they are collectors and their selection here is infused with the depth of their knowledge. This is the ICP library as a photobook laboratory. P&P are the mad photobook scientists.

The poster that has been created with this exhibit is amazingly beautiful, designed with precision and it is a piece of art that library patrons can take away for FREE.

P&P represent all that is best about the biblio-maniac artists' books community at the ICP and I truly hope that you can join them on Friday 2nd December 2011 – 6:00-8:00pm at the International Center of Photography Library in the ICP School on the South East corner of Sixth Avenue and 43rd Street.

